ETS 181: Class & Literary Texts is a regularly-offered 3-credit course on the Syracuse University campus. A university-designated writing-intensive course, it fulfills the College of Arts & Sciences Liberal Arts core curriculum and skills requirement, and thus familiarizes students with the thought processes, structures, and styles associated with writing in the liberal arts.

ETS 181 explores the construction and representation of social class, especially as it affects the production and reception of literary and other cultural texts. As with race and gender, class is a social construction that is imposed on, and performed by, all of us as a way of stratifying and defining who we are. Concepts such as social stratification, inequality, and the relationship between wealth, privilege and power provide critical lenses through which to read texts.

While fostering a richer understanding of their own implication within these systems of power, this course helps students become better writers and stronger interpretive readers by practicing close reading, evidence-based analysis and argumentation, and independent-inquiry skills. By raising awareness of how meanings are created through acts of critical reading, students learn to analyze the ways texts construct categories of difference, including differences of race, gender, and class. Thus through interpretive practice they develop a basic understanding of core concepts of social class, including stratification, inequality, privilege, capitalism and labor.

To encourage the development of reading skills of short and long texts, teachers are encouraged, but not required, to incorporate at least one full-length novel or play into the syllabus. The anchor texts for each unit are required. There are two kinds of writing assignments in this class: shorter, prompt-driven reading responses and four major writing assignments.

Grades will be based on three things: participation (contributing respectfully and productively to in-class discussion), reading responses, and major assignments.
